A handful of movies have been released that use this device, including David Fincher's The Social Network in 2010, and the documentaries Collateral (2004) and The Fog of War (2003). In the 2010 film The Social Network, Cambridge University's Election Technology Group (EGT) is used to record students' facial expressions for use in the 2011 Cambridge University Student Union elections. In 2014, the BBC reported that EGT had delivered a prototype system with five infrared cameras, one in each corner of the screen, and two in the bottom left and right corners. The report also said that there was a new first-person shooter game that used EGT technology built by Saffire. EGT claimed that its system could create a new world of interactive cinema, but the game was never built. Another demonstration was shown at the International Consumer Electronics Show (CES) in 2009, where the company claimed that within five years, the system would be able to track 20 million people simultaneously, and track their movements to within a metre of accuracy. In 2019, electronic media reported a case where a man was arrested on suspicion of spying on his ex-girlfriend. The man reportedly had a mass of 32,000 cameras installed in his home and had a database that tracked the exact placement of each camera, including information about time and date. The man claimed he installed the device to protect himself and his children from his ex-girlfriend who he claimed had posed a danger to them.
